Read collection overview

Beloved for her essays on New England life and for a long-running column in Yankee magazine, Edie Clark was born in northern New Jersey in 1948 and raised near Morristown. A graduate of Beaver College, Clark cut short a career as editor for the Chilton Company in 1973 when she and her husband, inspired by Scott Nearing, moved to Vermont to pursue a simpler, more self-sufficient life. Drawing on the skills honed at Chilton, Clark developed a successful editorial business, which led her to approach Yankee Magazine in 1978 with the idea of writing an article on Abby Rockefeller and composting toilets, beginning an association that would last nearly twenty years. In 1990, Clark began writing a regular column on country life for Yankee, and in the years since, she has written dozens of essays and seven books, including The place he made (2008), a memoir about her second husband's struggle with cancer; States of grace (2010), containing essays on "real Yankees;" and What there was not to tell (2013), an account of Clark's search to uncover her parents' experiences during the Second World War. Following a lengthy period of ill health, Clark retired from writing in 2017.

The record of a popular writer known for her depictions of contemporary New England, the Edie Clark Papers contain drafts and printed copies of nearly all of Clark's work. An assiduous researcher, she gathered background materials on topics ranging from Lyme disease to the New England-Canadian border region to psychics and Spiritualists, and she corresponded or conducted interviews with dozens of people who featured in her work, including the author Carolyn Chute (author of The Beans of Egypt, Maine) and her husband Michael, then leaders in the so-called Second Maine Militia. Even more voluminous are some remarkable Clark family materials, including dozens of essays and letters by Clark's grandmother Eleanor Sterling Clark and over 2,000 letters from her parents. Luther and Dorothy Clark, written during the Second World War while they were serving in the Army Air Corps and Marine Corps, respectively. These letters formed the basis for Clark's remarkable memoir, What there was not to tell.

Background on Edie Clark

Edie Clark was raised in a comfortable suburban setting in northern New Jersey but became known for her stories of life in small town New England. Clark's granddaughter, Luther Stowell Clark, was a prosperous New York banker with Blake Brothers and Co., and her grandmother Eleanor Sterling Clark was a leader in local educational and cultural life and a talented writer. Luther Stowell Clark, Jr. (1911-1994) followed his father to Princeton and after graduation in 1936, began work as an engineer with an insurance rating company.

Since childhood, Luther Clark, Jr., had in mind to marry Dorothy Rahmann of Summit, N.J., but she was less certain, and after meeting a young man, Theron G. "Tom" Platt, on vacation in the Adirondacks, she was torn as to which to pursue. All three were drawn into the service: Platt became a pilot in the 90th Bomb Group, Army Air Corps, and Luther an engineer with the Air Corps' 3rd Service Brigade. In 1942, Dorothy wrote to Platt after he shipped out for duty in the South Pacific, to tell him that she had would agree to marry, only to learn that he had been killed in action. Dorothy later joined the Women's Auxiliary of the Marine Corps, assigned to Miramar Air Station in California where she processed Marines returning from duty in the Pacific.

After three years' service in North Africa and Corsica, Luther returned home and pursued Dorothy to marry him. The couple were engaged in October 1945 and gave birth to their first child, Christina Hayden Clark, on Sept. 13, 1947, followed by Edie in 1948.

From a young age, Clark enjoyed writing, but as a student at Miss Gill's School and Beaver College, she was more interested in athletics than academics. After graduation, she moved to Philadelphia and worked briefly as an editor with a technical publisher before being hired into a similar position with Chilton Publications, known primarily for their technical manuals, but also as publisher of Frank Herbert's Dune.

Scope of collection

A record of a popular writer known for her depictions of contemporary New England, the Edie Clark Papers contain drafts and printed copies of nearly all of Clark's essays, columns, and books, along with a handful of short stories. An assiduous researcher intent on grounding her writing in the day to day rhythms of New England's regional culture and personalities, Clark collected a wealth of background materials on topics ranging from Lyme disease to the New England-Canadian border region to psychics and Spiritualists, and she corresponded or conducted interviews with dozens of people who featured in her work. Correspondence is scattered throughout the collection, but there is a particularly thick exchange with Carolyn Chute (author of The Beans of Egypt, Maine) and her husband Michael, who were leaders in the Second Maine Militia.

Even more voluminous are some remarkable family materials, including dozens of essays and letters by Clark's grandmother Eleanor Sterling Clark, and over 2,000 letters from her parents Luther and Dorothy Clark, written while they were serving in the Army Air Corps and Marine Corps, respectively, during the Second World War. These letters formed the basis for Clark's remarkable memoir, What there was not to tell.
