Poet Everett Hoagland was born and raised in Philadelphia and attended and graduated from Lincoln University, and later Brown University on a full fellowship for pursuing his Masters of Arts. Hoagland's poetry came of age during the civil rights struggles of the 1960s and the Black Arts Movement, and is often powerfully political. Driven by the history, music, rhythms, and both collective and individual stories from African and African American culture and experiences, Hoagland is one of the most significant African American poets of the late twentieth century. His second chapbook, Black Velvet, was published by the pioneering Broadside Press in 1970, and he has remained widely published and anthologized through to the present day, including a recent anthology addition, a poem about the Black Lives Matter movement. In addition to his writing, Hoagland has given readings across the nation and globe, and also served as a teacher and mentor to many, primarily in his position as a Professor of English at the University of Massachusetts Dartmouth for over thirty years. He has won numerous awards and honors, including the Gwendolyn Books Award for Fiction, two state-wide poetry competitions for Massachusetts Artists Foundation fellowships, the Distinguished Service to University award from UMass Dartmouth, two MA Local Cultural Council grants for book publications, ForeWord Magazine's Best Poetry Book award, and most recently in 2015, the Langston Hughes Society Award. Hoagland also served, from 1994 to 1998, as the inaugural poet laureate of his adopted hometown of New Bedford, MA.

The Everett Hoagland Papers include manuscript materials and over twenty books documenting Hoagland's decades-long career as a poet and writer on racial politics and African American experiences. They consist of photographs, performance and presentation programs, reviews, and readings; interviews and articles; and unpublished and published writings including copies of Hoagland's column in the New Bedford The Standard Times, a draft of his Master's thesis, short fiction stories, a scrapbook of unpublished poetry, and poetry in magazines, periodicals, Hoagland's authored poetry books, and numerous anthologies.

Background on Everett Hoagland Papers

Born in Philadelphia on December 18, 1942, Everett Hoagland came of age as a poet and a writer during the civil rights struggles of the 1960s and the Black Arts Movement. He graduated with an AB from Lincoln University, a historically black university, in 1963 and began to teach English and adult literacy in Philadelphia public schools. While a senior at Lincoln, Hoagland met with one of his heroes, and fellow Lincoln man, Langston Hughes, who was meeting with student poets. Hughes reported on a couple of things that he liked about Hoagland's manuscript and gave him a few suggestions to improve. One of those poems then won the creative writing award at the University, and over a half-century later, Hoagland would also win the Langston Hughes Society Award, a closing of the circle of his story with Hughes, whose advice had helped the young Hoagland forge his identity as a poet.

Already a published poet, Hoagland would next attend Brown University on a full fellowship, where he graduated with an MA in 1973 after submitting his thesis, a compilation of poems titled Niggers and Flies. Hoagland then began teaching at Southeastern Massachusetts University, now UMass Dartmouth, as a Professor of English, where he taught and mentored for thirty years.

Hoagland is one of the most significant African American poets of the late twentieth century and a significant contributor and supporter of the Black Arts Movement. His work is informed by a sense of history and struggle, and is driven by the weights of racial division, the rhythms of jazz, and both collective and individual stories drawn from African and African American culture and experiences. Broadside Press, the pioneering Black Arts press in Detroit, published Hoagland's second chapbook, Black Velvet, in 1970, and despite often being overlooked by academic critics, he remains widely published and anthologized through to the present day. Writer Maya Angelou described Hoagland as "someone who cares and someone who comprehends."

While the political and personal resound through Hoagland's poems, he also engages heavily with nature and the diversity and flow of the world beyond humanity. He has stated, "It's important that people know that black poets write all kinds of poems, including nature poems." A Baha'i for almost a decade, Hoagland also found in Unitarian Universalism a worldview that matched his own beliefs, particularly "the oneness-in-diversity of humanity, the interconnected web of existence, and universally equal human rights, [and] with no proscription against political activity." Believing that poems should be accessible and direct, and that poets should "distinguish themselves in the afterlife of their words" through their connections and social justice seeking action,

Hoagland has worked to engage with readers and communities to evoke change and connection. An example is Hoagland's Just Words, a book of political poetry published in support of the New Bedford non-profit, Treatment on Demand.

Throughout his career, he has won numerous awards and honors. These include the Gwendolyn Books Award for Fiction, the Distinguished Service to University award from UMass Dartmouth, two MA Local Cultural Council grants for book publications, two statewide poetry competitions for Massachusetts Artists Foundations fellowships, ForeWord Magazine's Best Poetry Book award, and most recently, the Langston Hughes Society Award in 2015. Hoagland also served, from 1994 to 1998, as the inaugural poet laureate of his adopted hometown of New Bedford, MA.
